Read the passage carefully.

Aloo Gobi going global? Celebrity Indian chef Sanjeev Kapoor, along with Better Value Brands, will spearhead a multi-national chain of Indian restaurants called Indi, which will serve updated Indian cuisine. Looking at launching the first restaurant in either London or Mumbai by early 2011, the concept-based chain will also offer ready-to-eat foods like jams and chutneys, cookware and books by the chef and author. "We want to remove any pre-conceived notions about Indian cuisine, which the younger generation might view as boring. We will incorporate elements from across India, but will also present items that may not exist, says Kapoor. "For example, we might have a Biryani roll. You will be able to identify the basic taste. But it will be packaged in a form that you have never seen before.

Kapoor insists that the look and feel of the restaurant will differ from his other offering, Yellow Chilli. The food at Yellow Chilli is, to some extent, predictable. The food and look of Indii will be very novel," he says.
