Chapter -- The fun they had

by Issac Asimov

In the 10th paragraph Margie is not so happy, she inputs her HW with a sigh. She was in her school before the screen but her mind was roaming elsewhere far away, thinking about his great grandfather's school days how enjoyable it was. All the children from the whole neighbourhood would come, laughing and shouting in the schoolyard, sitting together in the school room, going home at the end of the day. They used to learn the same things, so they could help one another with the HW and talk about it. On the other hand mechanical teacher keeps on flashing additions of fraction and she goes on thinking like-- those children had human teachers, not a mechanical one. They must have loved their school life but herself. She thinks,, probably they had fun of everything throughout the school life. Now author, Sir Issac Asimov ends his paragraphs here.

- Conclusion --- The Author talks about the fun that Margie's great and great grandfathers had during their school time, in the centuries ago when they were little boys. Margie is lost in imagination thinking about those fun, sitting in her class room where her screen and the mechanical teacher are already on.
